

Taiyo launches digestive health supplement

19 June 2017 | News

The 'Regular Girl' supplement launched by Japan-based Taiyo aims at health conscious women who suffer from, or want to prevent digestive irregularities.

The Regular girl powder was first launched and marketed in the US two years ago, but now it is being launched into the European, Middle East and African (EMEA) market.

The 'Regular Girl' supplement launched by Japan-based Taiyo aims at health conscious women who suffer from, or want to prevent digestive irregularities.

Formulated by a female nutritionist, each single serving of the supplement combines five grams of its prebiotic Sunfiber product with 8 colony forming units (CFU) of probiotics.

The Regular girl powder was first launched and marketed in the US two years ago, but now it is being launched into the European, Middle East and African (EMEA) market.

The powder contains only natural ingredients, is non-GMO verified, and is gluten-free and vegetarian.

The product comes as a single-serve powder stick which will help to simplify daily fiber and probiotic consumption, even on-the-go, by adding the powder to a meal or drink.

Due to its high solubility, the powder mixes perfectly with hot and cold beverages, smoothies and cereals without impacting the taste or texture.

The company feels confident that many women will benefit from this innovative product and also recommend to their family, as Regular Girl promotes digestive health for everybody.